

Part 1

Part 1: Planning

Student Demographics: The lesson is designed for young learners aged 11-13 in a small group of five students.

Proficiency Level: Students are at B1-B2 CEFR level, suitable for functional language practice such as making suggestions and recommendations, expressing opinions and agreeing/disagreeing, giving advice, complaining politely and problem-solving, making plans and arrangements, describing experiences and storytelling, and negotiating and compromising.

Cultural Context: Since the students are logging in from France, culturally relevant examples, such as familiar daily activities, will be incorporated.

Class Format: This is a small group online lesson with five learners.

Platform Selection: The lesson will be delivered via Zoom, using breakout rooms for paired practice and screen sharing for slides and visual aids.

Lesson Topic & Target Language: The lesson focuses on leisurely activities. Students will practice making plans and arrangements using phrases such as: "Why don't we...?", "How about...?", and "Would you like to...?"

Lead-in: The lesson begins with a short picture activity, showing images of different activities (e.g., going on a walk, going shopping, going to the beach, etc.). Students will name the activities and share their favorite activities in the chat to engage them and activate prior knowledge.

Presentation Stage: The teacher introduces target phrases using slides with images, audio clips of native speakers making plans, and model dialogues. Teach the pronunciation, drill it, and write examples for the form. Make sure to show examples for each phrase, "Why don't we...?", "How about...?", and "Would you like to...?", and ask the concept check question: "What were the three magic words at the beginning of the phrase?" for each phrase. Elicit from the students the pattern that each phrase of the target language is a question but with differing amounts of politeness with the concept check question: "Did anyone notice the special mark at the end of all three sentences?" Finally, pose the open-ended concept check question to help deepen understanding: "How would you use these phrases you learned in real life?"

Practice Stage: Students complete a controlled activity where they match different activities to phrases on a worksheet and practice short dialogues in pairs in breakout rooms. The teacher monitors progress and provides immediate corrective feedback in the chat or verbally.

Production Stage: Students engage in a freer role-play, making plans in a virtual scenario. Each student takes turns being the one to make suggestions, using target phrases creatively. Materials include role-play cards with prompts and images.

Multilevel Class Considerations: Let students choose their difficulty by offering activities with differing amounts of guidance (e.g., having more examples or pictures vs. being more open-ended) so that students of various proficiencies can enjoy an activity more tailored to their level.

Part 2

Part 2: Delivery

1. Creating a Welcoming Atmosphere:

To make the Zoom classroom feel welcoming, I'd greet each student by name as they join, ask them how their day is going, and make sure to smile to promote a positive learning environment. If necessary, to avoid long stretches of silence, narrate to ensure the environment does not feel tense or awkward like "We are still waiting for one more person." I would try to maximize STT and find opportunities for group work so that students can interact with each other and feel like they play a significant role in the lessons too besides just the teacher.

2. Classroom Management Challenge – What If?

Potential Problem: Young learners might lose energy or motivation throughout the lesson, leading to disengagement.

Real-Time Strategy: I would try to use short movement breaks and warm-ups to not only help consolidate and review knowledge but also make good use of polls so that lessons remain interactive. A more enthusiastic tone with visuals and videos in presentations can also help liven the atmosphere as well.

3. Delivering Each Stage of PPP – What If?

1. Presentation Stage – What if... students start looking bored because there's too much teacher talk?

As mentioned before with helping keep students engaged and motivated, I would introduce polls or more interactive activities where students work in breakout rooms to move the spotlight over to students. Going over examples, and especially ones with colorful pictures or videos can work, but keep things simple, as long winded explanations will not help maintain students' focus.

2. Practice Stage – What if... some students aren't fully participating in the controlled practice?

Stay patient but also motivating for students who might struggle with participation. If in a breakout room, prompt answers from everyone, so everyone can get a turn, and if students struggle with the task, then provide examples or model answers to help scaffold understanding.

3. Production Stage – What if... only a few students are actively contributing while others remain silent?

If only a few students are actively contributing while others remain silent, it implies that some students are more confident than others. If there are stronger or weaker students, I would pair the stronger ones together, and the weaker ones with each other so that they can have more of a chance to speak, and that way, the role play dialogues can feel more balanced.
